First automobile rolled into public view a century

To the residents of Mannheim, Germany, there was nothing special going on at the home of Carl Benz back in 1885. Nothing out of the ordinary seemed to be going on.

Suddenly the garage doors opened, there was a loud explosion and out came Benz in a strange looking, three-wheeled contraption that resembled a carriage, but had no horse. He only made a few turns in the "horseless carriage" before an ignition wire broke. It was, however, what many believe was the birth of the automobile.

That's why, all around the world, people are celebrating the 100th birthday of the automobile . . . the Centennial Celebration.

The history of "horseless carriages" does, in fact, go much further back than 100 years. Men were riding around in steam powered machines way back in the 1700s.

Stationary steam engines were fairly commonly used for wenching and Henry Ford wanted to build a car that would fit the needs of everyone, so he introduced the Model T, left, in 1908. 15 million of the cars were sold. That was a record that stood until 1972. The 1903 Packard Touring car, lower left, was a very popular automobile in its day. Steam cars, like the 1902 Capitol/Steam Chariot, below, were prototypes for the automobile.
